NOVEMBER 2018 ELECTION RESULTS

On November 6, voters decided 156 ballot propositions across 37 states, approving 69% of them. These propositions consisted of 83 legislative proposals, 62 citizen initiatives, 2 popular referendums, 7 commission proposals, 1 constitutionally required advisory measure, and 1 constitutionally required question on whether to call a constitutional convention.

The overall approval rate was down slightly from 2016 and identical to 2014. The number of approved initiatives — 32 for the year — is less than the 47 approved in 2016, but greater than the 16 approved in 2014. The initiative approval rate of 50% was well above the historical norm of 41%. For more information on initiative trends, see IRI Report on Initiative Use (1904-2018).

This report lists every state-level ballot proposition in 2018. Compared to the first version of the report, election outcome information has been updated to reflect official returns, and some errors have been corrected. ### Multistate Issues

Every year, some issues appear on the ballot in multiple states. Some of the more prominent multistate issues in 2018 were:

Marijuana Legalization

States began approving use of marijuana for medical purposes in the 1990s. In 2012, voters in Colorado and Washington took the next step by legalizing recreational use of the drug. Alaska, Oregon, and the District of Columbia followed in 2014, and California, Maine, Massachusetts, and Nevada followed in 2016. In 2018, Michigan joined the legalization club, approving Proposal 18-1 by a 56-44 vote. North Dakota, however, declined to take the same step, rejecting its own legalization Measure 3 by a 41-59 vote.

Missouri, Oklahoma (in a June election), and Utah also took a step toward legalization in 2018, by approving proposals to allow medical use of marijuana. Marijuana remains illegal under federal law, but so far states representing more than one-quarter of the country's population have decriminalized it within their borders.

Health Care Medicaid Expansion

The Affordable Care Act (often called "Obamacare") contained a provision permitting states to expand Medicaid eligibility to persons with incomes up to 138% of the federal poverty rate, with the federal government covering up to 90% of the cost. Elected officials in some states chose not to avail their states of this opportunity. In 2017, Maine voters used an initiative to override their government and directly approved expansion of Medicaid in their state. In 2018, voters in Idaho, Nebraska, and Utah did the same, using initiatives to force their states to expand Medicaid eligibility. Montana voters rejected a similar proposal that would have funded the expansion with a tobacco tax increase. These outcomes underscore the initiative's traditional function of allowing voters to override their elected officials on specific issues, allowing policy change without having to replace sitting legislators.

Election Reform

Elected officials face an inherent conflict of interest when considering laws related to elections since those laws may affect their future electoral prospects. For this reason, citizens have often turned to the initiative process to bring about electoral reforms that sitting officials are unwilling to advance. The most pronounced historical example of this was the term limits movement in the 1990s that imposed limited terms on state legislators across the country.

In 2018, four states (Colorado, Michigan, Missouri, Utah) approved ballot propositions that created nonpartisan or bipartisan redistricting commissions, or otherwise reduced the influence of the legislature in drawing district lines. In one of the highest profile campaigns of the year, Florida voters approved Amendment 4 that restored voting rights to an estimated 1.5 million felons. Other states also took actions to make voting easier: Maryland and Michigan approved same-day registration, and Nevada provided for automatic registration at the department of motor vehicles. Some states moved in the opposite direction: Arkansas and North Carolina approved measures requiring presentation of a photo ID to vote.

Bond Issues

Many states require voter approval in order to issue bonds, and voters usually approve such proposals. There were 17 bond issues across six states on November, requesting a total of $25 billion. Surprisingly, voters turned down three of the four largest requests. California voters said "no" to an $8.877 billion proposal for water projects. Colorado voters declined to approve a $6 billion issue of revenue anticipation bonds for transportation projects (perhaps because they disapproved of the sales tax hike that would have funded the debt) and they also turned down a $3.5 billion issue of general obligation bonds, also for transportation projects. The largest approved amounts were two California proposals, $4 billion for home loans to veterans and $1.5 billion for childrens' hospitals.
